

BILL C-9: AN ACT TO AMEND THE CRIMINAL CODE
(CONDITIONAL SENTENCE OF IMPRISONMENT)

Robin MacKay
Law and Government Division

12 May 2006
Revised 27 September 2007

Library of Parliament
Bibliothèque
du Parlement

Parliamentary
Information and Research Service

LEGISLATIVE HISTORY OF BILL C-9

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Bill Stage	Date
------------	------

First Reading:	4 May 2006
Second Reading:	6 June 2006
Committee Report:	24 October 2006
Report Stage:	1 November 2006
Third Reading:	3 November 2006

SENATE

Bill Stage	Date
------------	------

First Reading:	6 November 2006
Second Reading:	27 February 2007
Committee Report:	3 May 2007
Report Stage:
Third Reading:	16 May 2007

Royal Assent: 31 May 2007

Statutes of Canada 2007, c.12

N.B. Any substantive changes in this Legislative Summary which have been made since the preceding issue are indicated in bold print.

Legislative history by Michel Bédard

CE DOCUMENT EST AUSSI
PUBLIÉ EN FRANÇAIS

TABLE OF CONTENTS

	Page
BACKGROUND .....	1
A. General.....	1
B. The Legislative Basis for Conditional Sentencing.....	2
C. Suspended Sentences and Probation Orders .....	4
D. A Comparison of Conditional Sentences, Suspended Sentences and Probation Orders .....	5
E. Conditional Sentence Case-Law.....	7
1. R. v. Proulx .....	7
2. R. v. Wells .....	8
3. R. v. Knoblauch .....	9
4. R. v. Fice .....	10
5. R. v. F.(G.C.) .....	11
6. R. v. Bhalru; R. v. Khosa .....	11
7. R. v. Coffin .....	12
F. Conditional Sentencing Data .....	13
DESCRIPTION AND ANALYSIS .....	16
A. Clause 1: Replacement of Section 742.1 of the Criminal Code .....	16
COMMENTARY.....	17
APPENDIX: DESCRIPTION AND ANALYSIS OF THE FIRST-READING VERSION OF BILL C-9

CANADA

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT
BIBLIOTHÈQUE DU PARLEMENT

BILL C-9: AN ACT TO AMEND THE CRIMINAL CODE
(CONDITIONAL SENTENCE OF IMPRISONMENT)*

Bill C-9, An Act to amend the Criminal Code (conditional sentence of imprisonment) was given first reading in the House of Commons on 4 May 2006 and received Royal Assent on 31 May 2007. The bill amends section 742.1 of the Criminal Code<sup>(1)</sup> to provide that a person convicted of a serious personal injury offence as defined in section 752, a terrorism offence, or a criminal organization offence prosecuted by way of indictment, the maximum term of imprisonment in any of these cases being 10 years or more, is not eligible for a conditional sentence. Although the bill was not amended in the Senate, the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs did adopt certain observations. These observations noted, inter alia, the likely impact of the bill on the legal aid system as a result of a reduced number of guilty pleas and a greater number of appeals.<sup>(2)</sup>

BACKGROUND

A. General

Conditional sentencing, introduced in September 1996, allows for sentences of imprisonment to be served in the community, rather than in a correctional facility.<sup>(3)</sup> It is a midway point between imprisonment and sanctions such as probation or fines. The conditional sentence was not introduced in isolation, but as part of a renewal of the sentencing provisions in the Criminal Code. These provisions included the fundamental purpose and principles of * Notice: For clarity of exposition, the legislative proposals set out in the bill described in this legislative summary are stated as if they had already been adopted or were in force. It is important to note, however, that bills may be amended during their consideration by the House of Commons and Senate, and have no force or effect unless and until they are passed by both Houses of Parliament, receive Royal Assent, and come into force.

---

(1) R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46.

(2) A complete copy of the observations is available at <http://www.parl.gc.ca/39/1/parlbus/commbus/senate/Com-e/lega-e/rep-e/rep11may07-e.htm>.

(3) Conditional sentences were introduced by Bill C-41, now S.C. 1995, c. 22, proclaimed in force on 3 September 1996, amending the Criminal Code. Amendments to the conditional sentencing regime were made by Bill C-51, An Act to amend the Criminal Code, the Controlled Drugs and Substances Act and the Corrections and Conditional Release Act, S.C. 1999, c. 5. The relevant part (clauses 39-42) came into force on 1 July 1999.

sentencing. The fundamental principle of sentencing is that a sentence must be proportionate to the gravity of the offence and the degree of responsibility of the offender. The renewed sentencing provisions set out further sentencing principles, including a list of aggravating and mitigating circumstances that should guide sentences imposed.<sup>(4)</sup>

The primary goal of conditional sentencing is to reduce the reliance upon incarceration by providing an alternative sentencing mechanism to the courts. In addition, the conditional sentence provides an opportunity to further incorporate restorative justice concepts into the sentencing process by encouraging those who have caused harm to acknowledge this fact and to make reparation.

At the time of their introduction, conditional sentences were generally seen as an appropriate mechanism to divert minor offences and offenders away from the prison system. Overuse of incarceration was recognized by many as problematic, while restorative justice concepts were seen as beneficial. In practice, however, conditional sentences are sometimes viewed in a negative light when used in cases of very serious crime.<sup>(5)</sup>

Concern has been expressed that some offenders are receiving conditional sentences of imprisonment for crimes of serious violence, sexual assault and related offences, driving offences involving death or serious bodily harm, and theft committed in the context of a breach of trust. While allowing persons not dangerous to the community, who would otherwise be incarcerated, and who have not committed a serious or violent crime, to serve their sentence in the community is widely believed to be beneficial, it has also been argued that sometimes the very nature of the offence and the offender require incarceration. The fear is that to refuse to incarcerate an offender can bring the entire conditional sentence regime, and hence the criminal justice system, into disrepute. In other words, it is not the existence of conditional sentences that is problematic, but, rather, their use in cases that appear to justify incarceration.

B. The Legislative Basis for Conditional Sentencing

The provisions governing conditional sentences are set out in sections 742 to 742.7 of the Criminal Code. These set out four criteria that must be met before a conditional sentence can be considered by the sentencing judge:

1. the offence for which the person has been convicted must not be punishable by a minimum term of imprisonment;

---

(4) This legislative summary is based, in part, on Robin MacKay, Conditional Sentences, PRB 05-44E, Parliamentary Information and Research Service, Library of Parliament, Ottawa, 21 December 2005, <http://lpintrabp.parl.gc.ca/lopimages2/prbpubs/bp1000/prb0544-e.asp>.

(5) Alberta Justice and Attorney General, The Conditional Sentence of Imprisonment: The Need for Amendment, 17 June 2003.

2. the sentencing judge must have determined that the offence should be subject to a term of imprisonment of less than two years;
3. the sentencing judge must be satisfied that serving the sentence in the community would not endanger the safety of the community; and
4. the sentencing judge must be satisfied that the conditional sentence would be consistent with the fundamental purpose and principles of sentencing set out in sections 718 to 718.2 of the Criminal Code.

Insofar as the fourth criterion is concerned, among the objectives of sentencing are:

- the denunciation of unlawful conduct;
- the deterrence of the offender and others from committing offences;
- the separation of the offender from the community when necessary;
- the rehabilitation of the offender;
- the provision of reparation to victims or the community; and
- the promotion of a sense of responsibility in the offender.

The fundamental principle underlying sentencing is proportionality – the sanction imposed by the court must be proportionate to the gravity of the offence and the degree of responsibility of the offender. Among the other sentencing principles are that aggravating and mitigating factors be taken into account, that there be similarity of sentences for similar offences, that the totality of consecutive sentences should not be unduly long, and that the least restrictive sanction short of incarceration should be resorted to whenever possible.

In addition to meeting the criteria set out above, conditional sentences involve a number of compulsory conditions, as set out in section 742.3 of the Criminal Code. These conditions compel the offender to:

- keep the peace and be of good behaviour;
- appear before the court when required to do so;
- report to a supervisor where required;

- remain within the jurisdiction of the court, unless written permission to go outside that jurisdiction is obtained from the court or the supervisor; and
- notify the court or the supervisor in advance of any change of name or address, and promptly notify the court or the supervisor of any change of employment or occupation.

Furthermore, optional conditions are designed to respond to the circumstances of the individual offender. Such conditions may include an order that the offender abstain from the consumption of alcohol or drugs, abstain from owning, possessing or carrying a weapon, perform up to 240 hours of community service, or any other reasonable condition that the court considers desirable for securing the good conduct of the offender and for preventing a repetition by the offender of the same offence or the commission of another offence. The court must ensure that the offender is given a copy of this order, and an explanation of the procedure for changing the optional conditions and the consequences of breaching the conditions.

Section 742.6 of the Criminal Code sets out the procedure to be followed when one or more of the conditions of a conditional sentence is breached. The section contemplates that the allegation of the breach may be made out by documentary evidence. The allegation must be supported by a written report of the supervisor including, where possible, signed witness statements. The offender must be given a copy of this report. If the court is satisfied that a breach of a condition has been proved on a balance of probabilities, the burden is then on the offender to show a reasonable excuse. Where the breach is made out, the court may take no action, or change the optional conditions, or suspend the conditional sentence for a period of time and require the offender to serve a portion of the sentence and then resume the conditional sentence with or without changes to the optional conditions, or terminate the conditional sentence and require the offender to serve the balance of the sentence in custody.

C. Suspended Sentences and Probation Orders

As an alternative to the possibility of imposing a conditional sentence, a court may suspend sentence and impose a probation order. Section 731 of the Criminal Code indicates that, where a person is convicted of an offence, a court may, having regard to the age and character of the offender, the nature of the offence, and the circumstances surrounding its commission, suspend the passing of sentence and direct that the offender be released on the conditions prescribed in a probation order. This possibility is open to the court only if no minimum punishment is prescribed by law.

The court has the power to revoke a suspended sentence where the offender is convicted of an offence while on probation. The court also has the option of directing that the offender comply with the conditions prescribed in a probation order, in addition to fining or sentencing the offender to imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years. The term of imprisonment may be a conditional one, in which case the probation order comes into force at the expiration of the conditional sentence. A court may also make a probation order where it discharges (either absolutely or conditionally) an accused under subsection 730(1). The maximum period of probation is three years.

As with conditional sentences, there are mandatory and optional conditions for a probation order. Section 732.1 of the Criminal Code states that the mandatory conditions are that the offender keep the peace and be of good behaviour, appear before the court when required, notify the court or the probation officer in advance of any change of name or address, and promptly notify the court or the probation officer of any change of employment or occupation.

The optional conditions available to the court include a requirement that the offender report to a probation officer when required to do so, abstain from alcohol or drugs, abstain from owning, possessing or carrying a weapon, participate actively in a treatment program, if the offender agrees, and comply with such other reasonable conditions as the court considers desirable for protecting society and for facilitating the offender's successful reintegration into the community. As is the case with conditional sentences, the court is required to furnish the offender with a copy of the probation order, an explanation of the consequences for breaching the order, and an explanation of the procedure for applying to vary the optional conditions.

Section 733.1 of the Criminal Code sets out the consequences of an offender failing to comply with the terms of a probation order, without reasonable excuse. Such a failure is either an indictable offence and makes the offender liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years, or is a summary conviction offence and makes the offender liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding eighteen months or to a fine not exceeding $2,000, or both.

D. A Comparison of Conditional Sentences, Suspended Sentences and Probation Orders

The provisions set out above demonstrate some important differences between conditional sentences, suspended sentences, and probation orders. Firstly, unlike the suspended sentence under section 731(1)(a), the court acting under the conditional sentences provision actually imposes a sentence of imprisonment. This sentence, however, is served in the community, rather than in a correctional facility.

Secondly, under section 742.3(2)(e) the court may order the offender to attend a treatment program as part of a conditional sentence. There is no statutory requirement for the offender's consent as there is under section 732.1(3)(g) for probation orders.

Thirdly, the wording of the residual clause in section 732.1(3)(h) dealing with optional conditions in probation orders states that one of their goals is to facilitate the offender's successful reintegration into the community. This is unlike the residual clause in section 742.3(2)(f) dealing with conditions of conditional sentences, which does not focus principally on the rehabilitation and reintegration of the offender and therefore authorizes the imposition of punitive conditions such as house arrest or strict curfews. This again emphasizes that conditional sentences are considered to be more punitive than probation orders.

Finally, the punishment for breaching the conditions of a conditional sentence range from the court taking no action to the offender being required to serve the remainder of his or her sentence in custody. By contrast, breach of a probation order is made its own offence, with imprisonment a possible punishment. The differing consequences for breach of a condition are related to the fact that breaches of conditional sentence orders need be proved only on a balance of probabilities while breaches of probation orders, since they constitute a new offence, must be proved beyond a reasonable doubt.

E. Conditional Sentence Case-Law

The criticism that has been directed at sentencing practices in Canada tends to focus on the nature of the offence. It often omits consideration of how the courts weigh the aggravating and mitigating factors relevant to the offender, and the circumstances surrounding the offence, in crafting an appropriate sentence. Through the sentencing provisions of the Criminal Code, Parliament has placed a major emphasis on a "least restrictive measures" approach and has directed the courts to use incarceration only where community sentencing alternatives are not adequate. This is consistent with Parliament's concern to address the overuse of incarceration as a response to crime in Canada and to provide for a restorative justice approach to sentencing. Collectively, these principles encourage flexibility in the exercise of judicial discretion. Over time, the Courts of Appeal and the Supreme Court of Canada are providing more detailed guidance as to how the various principles should be applied to categories of offences and offenders. Examples of the cases that have considered various aspects of conditional sentencing are set out below.

1. R. v. Proulx<sup>(6)</sup>

The most important case to consider conditional sentencing is the decision of the Supreme Court in R. v. Proulx. Here, the Court examined the issue of conditional sentences in a case that concerned a charge of dangerous driving causing death and bodily harm. Prior to this decision, judges had little guidance on when it was appropriate to impose a conditional sentence, outside of the criteria set out in the Criminal Code. The Supreme Court made it clear that a number of changes needed to be made to the way in which the sanction was used. But the judgment also consists of a strong endorsement of conditional sentencing. The Supreme Court set out a number of principles, which may be summarized as follows:

1. Unlike probation, which is primarily a rehabilitative sentencing tool, a conditional sentence is intended to address both punitive and rehabilitative objectives. Accordingly, conditional sentences should generally include punitive conditions that restrict the offender's liberty. Therefore, conditions such as house arrest or strict curfews should be the norm, not the exception.
2. There is a two-stage process involved in determining whether to impose a conditional sentence. At the first stage, the sentencing judge merely considers whether to exclude the two possibilities of a penitentiary term or a probationary order as inappropriate, taking into consideration the fundamental purpose and principles of sentencing. At the second stage, having determined that the appropriate range of sentence is a term of imprisonment of less than two years, the judge should then consider whether it is appropriate for the offender to serve his or her sentence in the community.
3. "Safety of the community," which is one of the criteria to be considered by a sentencing judge, refers only to the threat posed by a specific offender and not to a broader risk of undermining respect for the law. It includes consideration of the risk of any criminal activity, including property offences. In considering the danger to the community, the judge must consider the risk of the offender re-offending and the gravity of the damage that could ensue. The risk should be assessed in light of the conditions that could be attached to the sentence. Thus, the danger that the offender might pose may be reduced to an acceptable level through the imposition of appropriate conditions.
4. A conditional sentence is available for all offences in which the statutory prerequisites are satisfied. There is no presumption that conditional sentences are inappropriate for specific offences. Nevertheless, the gravity of the offence is clearly relevant to determining whether a conditional sentence is appropriate in the circumstances.
5. There is also no presumption in favour of a conditional sentence if the prerequisites have been satisfied. Serious consideration, however, should be given to the imposition of a conditional sentence in all cases where these statutory prerequisites are satisfied.

---

(6) [2000], 1 S.C.R. 61.

6. A conditional sentence can provide a significant amount of denunciation, particularly when onerous conditions are imposed and the term of the sentence is longer than would have been imposed as a jail sentence. Generally, the more serious the offence, the longer and more onerous the conditional sentence should be.
7. A conditional sentence can also provide significant deterrence if sufficient punitive conditions are imposed, and judges should be wary of placing much weight on deterrence when choosing between a conditional sentence and incarceration.
8. When the objectives of rehabilitation, reparation and promotion of a sense of responsibility may realistically be achieved, a conditional sentence will likely be the appropriate sanction, subject to considerations of denunciation and deterrence.
9. While aggravating circumstances relating to the offence or the offender increase the need for denunciation and deterrence, a conditional sentence may be imposed even if such factors are present.
10. Neither party has the onus of establishing that the offender should or should not receive a conditional sentence. However, the offender will usually be best situated to convince the judge that such a sentence is appropriate. It will be in the offender's interest to make submissions and provide information establishing that a conditional sentence is appropriate.
11. The deference due to trial judges in imposing sentence generally applies to the decision whether or not to impose a conditional sentence.
12. Conditional sentencing was enacted both to reduce reliance on incarceration as a sanction and to increase the principles of restorative justice in sentencing.

The key result of the Proulx decision, therefore, is that there is no presumption against the use of a conditional sentence if the crime does not have a mandatory period of incarceration.

2. R. v. Wells<sup>(7)</sup>

Another key decision of the Supreme Court concerned the role that conditional sentencing should play in relation to Aboriginal offenders. The case of R. v. Wells involved a sentence of 20 months' imprisonment imposed on an Aboriginal man convicted of sexual assault. In upholding this sentence as appropriate in the circumstances, the Supreme Court found that the proper approach for considering a conditional sentence for an Aboriginal offender involves the following sequential considerations:

1. a preliminary consideration and exclusion of both a suspended sentence with probation and a penitentiary term of imprisonment as fit sentences;

---

(7) [2000] 1 S.C.R. 207.

2. assessment of the seriousness of the particular offence with regard to its gravity, which necessarily includes the harm done, and the offender's degree of responsibility;
3. judicial notice of the "systemic or background factors that have contributed to the difficulties faced by aboriginal people in both the criminal justice system and throughout society at large;" and
4. an inquiry into the unique circumstances of the offender, including any evidence of community initiatives to use restorative justice principles in addressing particular social problems.

While no offence is presumptively excluded from the possibility of a conditional sentence, as a practical matter, and notwithstanding section 718.2(e), particularly violent and serious offences will result in imprisonment for Aboriginal offenders as often as for non-Aboriginal offenders. While counsel and pre-sentence reports will be the primary source of information regarding the offender's circumstances, there is a positive duty on the sentencing judge to inform himself.<sup>(8)</sup> In this case, the sentencing judge did properly inform himself. The application of subsection 718.2(e) of the Criminal Code does not mean that Aboriginal offenders must always be sentenced in a manner that gives greatest weight to the principles of restorative justice and less weight to goals such as deterrence, denunciation, and separation. The offence in this case was a serious one, so the principles of denunciation and deterrence led to the imposition of a term of imprisonment.

3. R. v. Knoblauch<sup>(9)</sup>

Mentally ill offenders are not excluded from access to conditional sentences. In the case of R. v. Knoblauch, an offender with a long history of mental illness was found to be in possession of a substantial arsenal capable of causing great harm to the public and damage to property. He pleaded guilty to unlawful possession of an explosive substance and to unlawful possession of a weapon for a purpose dangerous to the public peace. In its decision, the Supreme Court upheld the imposition by the trial judge of a conditional sentence of two years less a day to be followed by three years of probation. The offender was required to spend the period of the conditional sentence in a secure psychiatric treatment unit, unless and until a consensus of psychiatric professionals made a decision to transfer him from the locked unit.

---

(8) Allan Manson, The Law of Sentencing, Irwin Law, Toronto, 2001, pp. 274-275.

(9) [2000] 2 S.C.R. 780.

The focus of the analysis in the Knoblauch case was on the risk posed by the individual offender while serving his sentence in the community. Danger to the community is evaluated by reference to the risk of re-offence and the gravity of the damage in the event of re-offence. While the gravity of the damage in this case could be extreme, the conditions imposed by the trial judge, including that the accused reside in a secure psychiatric facility, reduced the risk to a point that it was no greater than the risk that the accused would re-offend while incarcerated in a penal institution. The expansion in the scope of conditional sentences arose from the use of the new sanction to produce what is essentially confinement, albeit in a psychiatric facility rather than in a prison or penitentiary.

In this case, the optional conditions that may be imposed as part of a conditional sentence order were used to assess an offender's dangerousness and reduce the threat of recidivism. This is in contrast to the optional conditions of a probation order that are directed towards "facilitating the offender's successful reintegration into the community."<sup>(10)</sup> The appropriateness of confining the offender to a secure psychiatric facility flows from the intent of Parliament, in creating conditional sentences, to hold offenders accountable for offending while respecting the statutory purpose and principles of sentencing; this is to be done without subjecting the offender to penal confinement.<sup>(11)</sup> The importance of Knoblauch may lie in the ability of courts to send more offenders to mental health facilities and not prisons.

4. R. v. Fice<sup>(12)</sup>

In the case of R. v. Fice, the Supreme Court ruled that a woman who attacked her mother with a baseball bat and strangled her with a telephone cord should have been sent to prison rather than allowed to serve her sentence in the community. This case should serve to restrict the availability of conditional sentences across the country. Ms. Fice pleaded guilty to aggravated assault on her mother after the pair's argument turned violent. She also pleaded guilty to fraud, personation, forgery and breach of recognizance. The Supreme Court held that the time Ms. Fice had spent in pre-trial custody was not a mitigating factor that can affect the range of sentence and, therefore, the availability of a conditional sentence. The Court held that, in considering whether to impose a conditional sentence, a court must first decide that a sentence of less than two years is appropriate. The conditional sentence regime was not designed for those offenders for whom a

---

(10) Criminal Code, section 732.1(3)(h).

(11) Julian V. Roberts and Simon Verdun-Jones, "Directing Traffic at the Crossroads of Criminal Justice and Mental Health: Conditional Sentencing after the Judgment in Knoblauch," Alberta Law Review, Vol. 39, 2002, pp. 788-809.

(12) [2005] 1 S.C.R. 742.

penitentiary term is appropriate. When a sentencing judge considers the gravity of the offence and the moral blameworthiness of the offender and concludes that a sentence in the penitentiary range is warranted and that a conditional sentence is therefore unavailable, time spent in pre-sentence custody ought not to disturb this conclusion.

5. R. v. F.(G.C.)<sup>(13)</sup>

The case of R. v. F.(G.C.) illustrates the manner in which the Courts of Appeal in Canada have developed guidelines for the use of conditional sentencing by the lower courts. In this case, the accused was convicted of sexual assault and sexual interference for his grooming of two 13-year-old girls to become sex objects. This eventually led to the offender having sexual intercourse with one of the complainants. The trial judge imposed a conditional sentence of 12 months. The Crown successfully appealed this sentence to the Ontario Court of Appeal, which varied it to one year in custody, after giving credit for the one-year sentence already served. In its reasons for decision, the Court of Appeal pointed out that it had repeatedly indicated that a conditional sentence should rarely be imposed in cases involving sexual assault of children, particularly where the accused was in a position of trust. Moreover, cases that involve multiple sexual activities over an extended period of time and escalating in obtrusiveness generally warrant a severe sentence. The trial judge had also failed to take into consideration the fundamental sentencing principle in section 718.1 of the Criminal Code that a sentence must be proportionate to the gravity of the offence and the degree of responsibility of the offender.

6. R. v. Bhalru; R. v. Khosa<sup>(14)</sup>

The case of R. v. Bhalru; R. v. Khosa is an example of a Court of Appeal upholding a trial judge's imposition of a conditional sentence in the face of a Crown appeal. Here, two individuals were convicted of criminal negligence causing death arising out of a street race in which they participated. In the course of the race, a pedestrian was struck and killed. The trial judge ordered the two drivers to serve conditional sentences of two years less a day, followed by probation for three years. The terms imposed as part of the conditional sentences included house arrest with limited exceptions and an order to perform 240 hours of community work over a period of 18 months. A five-year driving prohibition was also imposed.

---

(13) (2004), 71 O.R. (3d) 771 (C.A.).

(14) [2003] BCCA 645.

The Crown argued that the sentences were unfit. This appeal was denied by the Court of Appeal. It followed the principles articulated in Proulx, and the judicial recognition that conditional sentences may achieve general deterrence and denunciation in driving offences in some circumstances, in concluding that the sentence was consistent with the sentencing principles and was not demonstrably unfit. The Court of Appeal also found that there was an absence of aggravating factors beyond the street racing in this case; that, in addition to the strict nature of the conditional order that the trial judge fashioned, indicated that it was not unreasonable to order the two convicted persons to serve their sentence in the community.

7. R. v. Coffin<sup>(15)</sup>

The case of R. v. Coffin is an example of a Court of Appeal emphasizing different aspects of the sentencing principles in order to impose a sentence of imprisonment in place of a conditional sentence. The offender in this case had pleaded guilty to 15 charges of defrauding the Government of Canada. At trial, he was sentenced to a conditional sentence of two years less a day, due, in part, to his public acknowledgment of his guilt and return of moneys illegally obtained. The Court of Appeal overturned this sentence and, in its place, sentenced Mr. Coffin to 18 months' imprisonment.

The appeal court found that the trial judge had not placed sufficient emphasis upon certain principles and objectives of sentencing. One of these was that a sentence must be proportionate to the gravity of the offence and the degree of responsibility of the offender.<sup>(16)</sup> In this case, the crimes were well-planned, of long duration, and involved large amounts of public money and, therefore, lowered the level of trust in government. The second principle insufficiently emphasized by the trial judge was that an important objective of sentencing is that of denunciation and deterrence.<sup>(17)</sup> Here, a person in a position of privilege had defrauded the government and a strong message of denunciation and deterrence needed to be sent. Finally, the trial judge did not sufficiently emphasize the principle that a sentence should be similar to sentences imposed on similar offenders for similar offences committed in similar circumstances.<sup>(18)</sup> Generally, a term of imprisonment was the sentence in Canada for large, planned frauds that took place over extended periods of time. The Coffin decision included an appendix with over 50 decisions to support its conclusion that a consensus had emerged on how to punish people in Mr. Coffin's position.

---

(15) 2006 QCCA 471.

(16) Criminal Code, s. 718.1.

(17) Criminal Code, s. 718(a) and 718(b).

(18) Criminal Code, s. 718.2(b).

F. Conditional Sentencing Data

Statistics Canada reports that conditional sentences still represent a small proportion of all sentences. A conditional sentence was imposed in 5% of all cases resulting in a conviction, and a small percentage of all sentences. Thus, in 2003-2004, of the 104,183 sentences of custody imposed across Canada, 13,267 or 12.7% were conditional sentences of imprisonment.<sup>(19)</sup> Of these, 4,215 conditional sentences were imposed for property offences while 3,619 were imposed for crimes against the person.

On an average day in 2004-2005, 152,600 adults were under the supervision of correctional services agencies in Canada, down 1% from the previous year.<sup>(20)</sup> Four out of five of these adults, about 120,500, were being supervised in the community. Of these, the vast majority (82%) were on probation, 12% were on conditional sentences, and 6% were on parole or statutory release. The remaining one in five adults, about 32,100, were in a federal penitentiary or in a provincial or territorial jail. Statistics Canada states that the implementation of the conditional sentence in 1996 provided the courts with a community-based alternative to imprisonment, and has had a direct impact on the decline in the number of sentenced prison admissions.<sup>(21)</sup>

The imposition of conditional sentences will not only result in a decline in the rate of incarceration, it should also represent a significant monetary saving; the average annual inmate cost for persons in provincial/territorial custody (including remand and other temporary detention) in 2002-2003 was $51,454, while the average annual cost of supervising an offender in the community (including conditional sentences, probation, bail supervision, fine option, and conditional release) was $1,792.<sup>(22)</sup>

A study by Statistics Canada over the period 2003-2004 to 2004-2005 found that adult offenders who spent their sentence under supervision in the community were far less likely to become reinvolved with correctional authorities within 12 months of their release than those who

---

(19) See the Statistics Canada report Cases in adult criminal court by type of sentence; total convicted cases, prison, conditional sentence, probation, by province and Yukon Territory, 7 September 2005, <http://www40.statcan.ca/101/cst01/legal22a.htm>. Note that Quebec does not report conditional sentencing data.

(20) Statistics Canada, The Daily, 11 October 2006, <http://www.statcan.ca/Daily/English/061011/d061011a.htm>.

(21) Statistics Canada, The Daily, 16 December 2005, <http://www.statcan.ca/Daily/English/051216/d051216b.htm>.

(22) Canadian Centre for Justice Statistics, Adult Correctional Services in Canada, 2002-2003, Table 11, <http://dsp-psd.communication.gc.ca/Collection-R/Statcan/85-002-XIE/0100485-002-XIE.pdf>.

were in a correctional institution.<sup>(23)</sup> The study found that 11% of people who were on community supervision became reinvolved with correctional authorities within 12 months of their release in 2003-2004. Among those in custody, 30% were reinvolved. Reinvolverment rates varied by offence type. Higher rates of reinvolverment were seen for breaking and entering, theft and possession of stolen property, or robbery. Some of the lowest reinvolverment rates were found for sexual offences, drug offences and Criminal Code traffic offences.

An earlier survey found that the successful completion rate of conditional sentence orders fell from 78% in 1997-1998 to 63% in 2000-2001. This failure rate was largely attributed to breaches of the increasing number of conditions placed upon offenders rather than allegations of fresh offending.<sup>(24)</sup> A study of the trial courts in Ontario and Manitoba reveals an increase in the proportion of offenders being committed to custody and a corresponding decline in the proportion of offenders being permitted to continue serving their sentences in the community, following an unjustified breach of conditions. In 1997-1998, for example, 65% of offenders in Manitoba found to have breached their orders without reasonable excuse were subsequently committed to custody for some period of time; in 2000-2001, this proportion rose to 74%. In Ontario, the proportion rose from 42% to 50% over the same period. These data demonstrate a more rigorous judicial response to the breach of a conditional sentence order following the judgment of the Supreme Court in the Proulx case.<sup>(25)</sup>

Due to the relatively recent introduction of conditional sentencing, few academic studies of its impact upon the criminal justice system have been completed. Furthermore, there is a dearth of sentencing statistics in Canada, with even the Adult Criminal Court Survey of Statistics Canada lacking important data. One study that has been done found that conditional sentencing has had a significant impact on the rates of admission to custody, which have declined by 13% since its introduction.<sup>(26)</sup> This represents a reduction of approximately 55,000 offenders who otherwise would have been admitted to custody. There has been, however, evidence as well of net-widening; approximately 5,000 offenders who prior to 1996 would have received a non-custodial sanction were sentenced to a conditional sentence, which is a form of custody.

---

(23) Statistics Canada, The Daily, 15 December 2006, <http://www.statcan.ca/Daily/English/061215/d061215b.htm>.

(24) Julian V. Roberts, "The Evolution of Conditional Sentencing: An Empirical Analysis," Criminal Reports, 6th Series, Vol. 3, 2002, pp. 267-283 (Table 7).

(25) David M. Paciocco and Julian Roberts, Sentencing in Cases of Impaired Driving Causing Bodily Harm or Impaired Driving Causing Death, Canada Safety Council, Ottawa, 25 February 2005.

(26) Julian V. Roberts and Thomas Gabor, "The Impact of Conditional Sentencing: Decarceration and Widening of the Net," Canadian Criminal Law Review, Vol. 8, 2004, pp. 33-49.

Considerable variation in incarceration rates was found between provinces: in some jurisdictions net-widening was quite significant; in other provinces, the opposite occurred.<sup>(27)</sup> In several provinces, the reduction in the number of admissions to custody exceeds by a considerable margin the number of conditional sentences imposed. Thus, there has been a general shift towards the greater use of alternatives to imprisonment, possibly as a result of the statutory reforms introduced in 1996.<sup>(28)</sup> One of these changes was the codification of the principle of restraint with respect to the use of imprisonment.

In a study that concentrated upon the victims of crime and their attitudes towards conditional sentencing, the benefits of conditional sentencing are said to be as follows:

- Most rehabilitation programs can be more effectively implemented when the offender is in the community rather than in custody.
- Prison is no more effective a deterrent than more severe intermediate punishments, such as enhanced probation or home confinement.
- Keeping offenders in custody is significantly more expensive than supervising them in the community.
- The public has become more supportive of community-based sentencing, except for serious crimes of violence.
- Widespread interest in restorative justice has sparked interest in community-based sanctions. Restorative justice initiatives seek to promote the interests of the victim at all stages of the criminal justice process, but particularly at the sentencing stage.
- The virtues of community-based sanctions include the saving of valuable correctional resources and the ability of the offender to continue or seek employment and maintain ties with his or her family.<sup>(29)</sup>

The study concluded that, while it was clear that there was an acceptance amongst victims of the concept of community-based sentencing, the acceptance does not extend to its use in the most serious crimes of violence.<sup>(30)</sup> The seriousness of such offences appeared to warrant a custodial term, in the eyes of victims. Research on conditional sentencing suggests that only a small

---

(27) Ibid.

(28) Roberts (2002), p. 267.

(29) Julian V. Roberts and Kent Roach, "Conditional Sentencing and the Perspectives of Crime Victims: A Socio-Legal Analysis," Queen's Law Journal, Vol. 30, 2005, pp. 560-600.

(30) Ibid., p. 599.

percentage of conditional sentences are imposed for the most serious crimes of violence. Yet greater attention to the interests of victims in crafting conditional sentences could advance the restorative purposes of sentencing by providing reparation, acknowledgment of harm, and protection to crime victims. It could also help offenders understand the harms caused by their crimes and enhance the credibility of the conditional sentence as a meaningful alternative to imprisonment.

DESCRIPTION AND ANALYSIS

Bill C-9 consists of 2 clauses.

A. Clause 1: Replacement of Section 742.1 of the Criminal Code

The proposed replacement to section 742.1 of the Criminal Code provides that a person convicted of a serious personal injury offence as defined in section 752, a terrorism offence, or a criminal organization offence prosecuted by way of indictment, the maximum term of imprisonment in any of these cases being 10 years or more, is not eligible for a conditional sentence.

The term “serious personal injury offence” is defined in section 752 of the Criminal Code in the definitions section for Part XXIV – Dangerous Offenders and Long-Term Offenders. It is defined to mean an indictable offence, other than high treason, treason, first degree murder or second degree murder, involving the use or attempted use of violence against another person, or conduct endangering or likely to endanger the life or safety of another person or inflicting or likely to inflict severe psychological damage upon another person. A “serious personal injury offence” may also be an offence or attempt to commit an offence mentioned in section 271 (sexual assault), 272 (sexual assault with a weapon, threats to a third party or causing bodily harm) or 273 (aggravated sexual assault).

The term “terrorism offence” is defined in section 2 of the Criminal Code. It means an offence under any of sections 83.02 to 83.04 or 83.18 to 83.23, an indictable offence committed for the benefit of, at the direction of or in association with a terrorist group, an indictable offence where the act or omission constituting the offence also constitutes a terrorist activity, or a conspiracy or attempt to commit, or being an accessory after the fact in relation to, or any counselling in relation to, any of the listed offences. The specific offence sections of the Criminal Code referred to encompass offences related to the financing of terrorism as well as to participating in the activity of a terrorist group, facilitating terrorist activity, instructing others to carry out terrorist activity, and harbouring or concealing a terrorist. “Terrorist group” and “terrorist activity” are defined in section 83.01(1) of the Criminal Code in the definitions section of Part II.1 – Terrorism.

The term “criminal organization offence” is also defined in section 2 of the Criminal Code. It means an offence under section 467.11, 467.12 or 467.13, or a serious offence committed for the benefit of, at the direction of, or in association with, a criminal organization. The term also means a conspiracy or attempt to commit, being an accessory after the fact in relation to, or any counselling in relation to, any of the offences already referred to. A “criminal organization” is defined in section 467.1(1) of the Criminal Code as a group, however organized, that is composed of three or more persons in or outside Canada and that has as one of its main purposes or main activities the facilitation or commission of one or more serious offences that, if committed, would likely result in the direct or indirect receipt of a material benefit, including a financial benefit, by the group or by any of the persons who constitute the group. It does not include a group of persons that forms randomly for the immediate commission of a single offence. The specific offences referred to in the definition of a criminal organization offence are participation in the activities of a criminal organization, commission of an offence for a criminal organization, and instructing the commission of an offence for a criminal organization.

COMMENTARY

While the version of Bill C-9 that was first introduced in Parliament received a great deal of comment, both positive and negative, the amended version of the bill has received little commentary. The effect upon prison populations and government finances was easier to gauge with the original version of Bill C-9, while the implications of the amended version are much less clear.

APPENDIX

DESCRIPTION AND ANALYSIS OF THE FIRST-READING VERSION OF BILL C-9

APPENDIX

DESCRIPTION AND ANALYSIS OF THE FIRST-READING VERSION OF BILL C-9

DESCRIPTION AND ANALYSIS

Bill C-9 consists of 1 clause.

A. Clause 1: Replacement of Section 742.1 of the Criminal Code

The replacement to section 742.1 of the Criminal Code will provide that a person convicted of an offence prosecuted by way of indictment for which the maximum term of imprisonment is ten years or more is not eligible for a conditional sentence. There are over 100 offences in the Criminal Code with maximum sentences of ten years' imprisonment or more. Some of these, such as murder, child pornography and weapons offences, already have mandatory minimum sentences, and so offenders cannot receive a conditional sentence. Those offences that will be affected by Bill C-9's restrictions range from attempted murder to possessing counterfeit money. The ten-year threshold, therefore, does not designate violent versus non-violent offences.

The government estimates that the combined effect of Bill C-9 and Bill C-10 will be to place 300 to 400 more offenders into federal penitentiaries and an additional 3,800 a year into provincial jails.<sup>(1)</sup> This represents a 15 to 20% increase in the provincial inmate population and a 3% increase in federal penitentiaries. There are currently 70 federal prisons in Canada and 116 provincial jails.<sup>(2)</sup> In another estimate, government officials have said that the bill would mean about 5,500 people annually would no longer be able to serve their time at home and be monitored through an electronic tracking device.<sup>(3)</sup>

---

(1) Editorial, "Filling the Jails," The Chronicle-Herald, 8 May 2006, p. A7.

(2) Bill Curry, "Saskatchewan warns of risk to justice system: More natives will be jailed, minister fears," The Globe and Mail [Toronto], 5 May 2006, p. A6.

(3) Joel Kom, "Tories get tough on non-violent offenders: Harsh mandatory sentences not limited to dangerous criminals," Ottawa Citizen, 5 May 2006, p. A1.